the patients suddenly take fright and jump out of bed; ringing in the ears, weakness of sight, amaurosis, diplopia, contraction and dilation of the pupils; squinting, fulness and feeling of heaviness, with violent pain in the orbit, formation and prickling from the index and thumb of the right hand to the shoulder. The look is suddenly changed, as if frightened; dull or meditating, sadness, extreme uneasiness; indifference; taciturnity; peevish mood; weeping without any apparent cause; constant change of locality, as if driven by fear and terror; stupor, slowness of thought and motion; dysphagia; constrictive sensation in the fauces; turbid urine, which is pale and without sediment, during an attack of colic, (Hulxam.) Paralysis. Colic (12 attacks.) Sudden disappearance of the colic.—The encephalopathia generally commences at night. Encephalopathia, with delirium. The delirium is either light or violent, partial or general, continuous, remitting or intermitting, with or without loss of one or more senses.

A.—BLAND DELIRIUM.

The following phenomena alternate with wonderful rapidity in a couple of hours: look full of wonderment, with immobility of the eyes; look full of deep meditation, expression of countenance, which is at times full of mildness, at others full of dissatisfaction, at other times the expression is stupid. Three patients seemed to be in a sort of ecstasis. Some were constantly laughing, and seemed to be attacked with risus sardonius, others were crying violently, with melancholy looks. Questions were answered in such a manner as led one to suppose that there was no correspondence whatsoever between the physiognomy of the patients and their ideas. At first the answers are quite rational, after which they suddenly break forth in a multitude of incoherent words, and finally, after a long interval, they again talk rationally. Some do not answer immediately, but seem to be thinking of words for their ideas, speak one word for another, or they give correct answers without looking at the person who addressed the question to them; or the patients do not seem to understand the question except after it has been frequently repeated, or they return the same answer to every question. If left alone, the patients are at times silent, at times they talk to themselves, call to the neighbours or to absent persons; they reply to all who are talking around them, or whom they suppose to be present. In their delirium they talk about all sorts of things; frequently the ideas remain the same during several successive periods of their delirium. The speech in general unimpeded, and the voice has its natural vibration. Some mutter, and utter unintelligible sounds in a low tone. Accompanying symptoms are: agitated movements of the arms, throwing off the bed cover; desire to go away, to get into the bed of some other person; micturition at any place indiscriminately as soon as the desire is felt. The patients recognize persons imperfectly, but get into their beds again if admonished by their nurses. Some tremble slightly, particularly with the arms and face, or they use their arms with difficulty, and stutter. Hallucinations of sight and hearing; they see frightful things, which drive them out of their beds; or they hear music, &c.

B.—FURIOUS DELIRIUM.

The eyes are widely open, threatening, wild; the features are spasmodically contracted. They shriek, curse, tear their clothes and fetters. They rush upon others to injure them. The rage increases by violent opposition, the patients then run against the walls, or throw themselves out of the windows. Every opposition of force brings on an attack of rage.

Accompanying Symptoms.

Spasmodic contractions of the fascial muscles, distortion of the eyes, cracking of the jaws, subsultus tendinum, or trembling of the limbs, frightful hallucinations; lamentations and curses, induced by a belief that they will be poisoned, &c. Confused delirium, with abrupt stuttering words and loud voice. Delirium and paroxysms of rage generally set in together. There are frequently long intervals of rest between the paroxysms—the agitation is seldom permanent. The patients think of words, and become enraged if unable to find them. Sometimes a few words are rational, the others again delirious. The face is generally straw-coloured, sometimes injected, sweat breaks out after a long paroxysm. After long and violent paroxysms the tongue becomes dry, parched, and, as well as the teeth, is covered with yellow or blackish crusts; the movements of the limbs are unsteady, trembling as in chorea. If amaurosis supervene, the patients stagger from side to side. Both the bland and furious delirium soon increase to the highest degree of violence; sometimes, however, the attack remains incomplete for hours and even days, and is confined to illusions of the senses and incoherence of the ideas, with trembling of the limbs and hurried speech. The completely developed delirium is exceedingly irregular in its course, and increases or diminishes without order or periodicity.—

Sometimes the delirium progresses in paroxysms, with lucid intervals. The bland and furious delirium frequently alternate without regularity during the course of the malady, though each may exist isolatedly. Some patients are attacked with bland delirium in the day time, and furious delirium at night. Between the paroxysms of alternate delirium the patients are soporose, with their eyes half closed, and frequently opened unequally, or entirely opened at times, with stertorous breathing and muttering; this sopor likewise alternates with either kind of delirium, sets in from time to time, less frequently at night than in the day time, generally one or two days after the commencement of the disease, for minutes or hours, but is almost always shorter than the paroxysms of delirium. In twenty-two patients, the blood taken from a vein was unchanged, in one case only there was a buffy coat; the pulse was full and regular, 70 to 80 (Br.), Plumb. met.
